Early Life and Career

George Cartwright was born in Nottinghamshire, England, in 1739. He came from a wealthy family and received a privileged education. However, his adventurous spirit led him to a life of exploration and adventure.

In 1765, Cartwright arrived in Labrador as a fur trader. He quickly established himself as a successful trader, building several trading posts along the coast. He also developed close relationships with the local Inuit and Innu peoples, learning their language and customs.

Explorations

In addition to his trading activities, Cartwright was also a keen explorer. He spent years traveling the interior of Labrador, mapping the coastline and charting its rivers and lakes. He was the first European to explore the Hamilton Inlet and the Grand Lake.

Cartwright's explorations were not without their dangers. He encountered numerous hardships, including extreme weather conditions, treacherous terrain, and hostile wildlife. He also faced conflicts with rival fur traders and indigenous tribes.

A Journal of Transactions and Events

In 1792, Cartwright published his book, "A Journal of Transactions and Events, During a Residence of Nearly Sixteen Years on the Coast of Labrador." The book is a detailed account of his experiences in the region, including his trading activities, explorations, and interactions with the local population.

Cartwright's journal provides a wealth of information about the natural history, geography, and culture of Labrador in the 18th century. It is also a valuable historical document that sheds light on the fur trade and the lives of the people who lived in this remote region.

Later Life and Legacy

Cartwright left Labrador in 1794, returning to England after nearly three decades in the wilderness. He continued to write and lecture about his experiences, becoming a respected authority on Labrador and its people.

George Cartwright died in 1819, leaving behind a legacy as one of the most important explorers of Labrador. His contributions to the understanding of the region's geography, natural history, and culture are still recognized today.

George Cartwright was a fascinating figure whose life and adventures provide a glimpse into a bygone era. His experiences in Labrador were remarkable, and his book, "A Journal of Transactions and Events," remains an invaluable source of information about this remote and beautiful region.
