There is no doubt that Joseph Kennedy was a complex and enigmatic figure. He was a man of great ambition and drive, but he was also capable of great ruthlessness. His relationship with his son, John, was often strained, and there were times when Joseph seemed to resent his son's success. In the years leading up to the assassination, Joseph Kennedy made a number of decisions that may have contributed to his son's death.

One of the most significant betrayals that Joseph Kennedy committed was his failure to protect his son from the dangers of the presidency. Kennedy was aware of the threats that his son faced, but he did little to shield him from them. He even went so far as to encourage his son to run for president, despite knowing that he would be putting himself in danger.

Another betrayal that Joseph Kennedy committed was his manipulation of the investigation into his son's death. Kennedy used his influence to pressure the FBI to focus on Lee Harvey Oswald as the lone gunman, despite the fact that there was evidence suggesting that there may have been a conspiracy to kill the president. Kennedy's actions may have helped to ensure that the true culprits behind the assassination were never brought to justice.
