Yokohama's Humble Beginnings

Yokohama's history can be traced back to the Edo period (1603-1868), when it was a small fishing village known as Kanagawa. In 1859, the village was opened to foreign trade as part of the Treaty of Kanagawa, which marked the beginning of Yokohama's transformation into a major port city.

In the early days of foreign trade, Yokohama was primarily a trading post for silk and tea. However, the city's strategic location and deep-water harbor soon attracted shipbuilders and manufacturers. By the late 19th century, Yokohama had become a major shipbuilding center, with several shipyards producing vessels for both domestic and international markets.

Yokohama's industrial development was further accelerated by the establishment of the Yokohama Specie Bank in 1880. The bank played a crucial role in financing Japan's industrialization and helped to make Yokohama a major financial center.
