Background

In 401 BC, the Persian prince Cyrus the Younger gathered an army of Greek mercenaries to help him overthrow his brother, Artaxerxes II, and seize the throne. The mercenaries were led by Clearchus of Sparta, a seasoned military commander. The army set out from Sardis in western Turkey and marched eastward toward Babylon.

At first, the mercenaries were successful. They defeated the Persian army at the Battle of Cunaxa, but Cyrus was killed in the battle. With their leader dead, the mercenaries found themselves stranded in the heart of the Persian Empire, thousands of miles from home.

The March

The mercenaries decided to march north to the Black Sea, where they hoped to find ships that would take them home. The journey was incredibly difficult. The mercenaries had to cross treacherous mountains, scorching deserts, and hostile territory. They were constantly harassed by the Persian army, which was determined to destroy them.

Despite the challenges, the mercenaries persevered. They fought their way through every obstacle, their courage and resilience inspiring awe in their enemies. Finally, after a year-long journey, the mercenaries reached the Black Sea. They found ships that took them home to Greece, where they were hailed as heroes.

Aftermath

The March of the Ten Thousand had a profound impact on the ancient world. The mercenaries' courage and resilience became a legend, and their story was told for centuries to come. The march also showed the strength of the Greek military, and it helped to inspire the rise of Alexander the Great, who would conquer the Persian Empire a few years later.

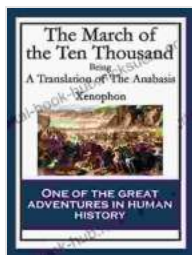

Legacy
